Ole Bull.

It has become the fashion of late years among newspaper critics and musicians which affect the style of music which they call "classical," to speak slightly of Ole Bull as a player who could amuse a crowd well enough with his fiddle, but who was by no means the sort of a performer to satisfy their own fastidious ears; and yet the old man who passed away in his native town of Bergen, a day or two ago, at the ripe old age of 70, took the place that had been left vacant by Paganini, and for at least a quarter of a century held it against the world as the greatest living player upon the violin. Europe was not in a state of barbarism even when Ole Bull was young; and there was no capital too highly trained in the knowledge of music, and no court too exclusive, to welcome the tall Norwegian as the chief among their musicians. Was this all a blunder, and did the most highly educated musical ears of a continent mistake a second-rate fiddler for a really great artist, whom all tried to imitate, but none could equal.

George Lessard, of Montreal, aged ninety-nine, has just married his fourth wife. With his first and third wives he lived thirty-one years respectively, the second wife dying within a year after marriage.

Mountain travel is not very brisk, and it is evident that the seaside resorts have the "boom" this year.
